- Conclusion

INTRODUCTION

Asexual reproduction in plants is generally referred as the vegetative reproduction. It produces 5-6 copies of parents they are referred as clones. The parts of plants that are involved in the propagation are known as vegetative propagules.

There are 2 types in vegetative propagation

- 1) Natural
- 2) Artificial

Natural vegetative propagation

1) RHIZOME:

- ❖ It is underground modification of stem. Differentiated into nodes and internodes.
- ❖ At each node there are brownish scaly leaves having a bud in its axial. Some of the axillary buds develop aerial shoot annually.
- ❖ Large number of adventitious roots are developed from the lower side of rhizome.

Eg-Ginger officinale (Ginger)

2) BULB:

- ❖ The stem is extremely reduced to short & convex disc with compressed internodes.
- ❖ Leaf bases are thick, fleshy and arranged concentrically there by they completely cover the stem.

Eg-Allium sepa (Onion), Allium sativum (Garlic)

3) CORM:

- ❖ The corm is more or less round, solid & vertically fleshy underground stem. Buds are developed at each node in the axils of membranous scaly leaves scattered around the entire body.
- ❖ Adventitious roots are developed from the base or all over its body.

Eg- Amorphophallus, Gladiolus, Colocasia.

4) SUCKER:

- ❖ Like runner it develops pro-straight branch which originates from the under ground stem.
- ❖ After growing for a short distance it develops lower adventitious roots.

Eg- Chrysanthemum.

Conclusion:

Thus these are some of the examples
for natural methods of vegetative propagation.

Catalysis

Definition: The phenomenon of changing the rate of a chemical reaction by a substance is called as catalysis.

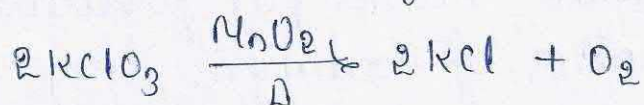

Definition of Catalyst: A substance which alters (increase or decrease) the rate of reaction, but which remains unchanged chemically and is not consumed in reaction is called catalyst.

Types of Catalyst

There are 2 types of catalyst, namely.

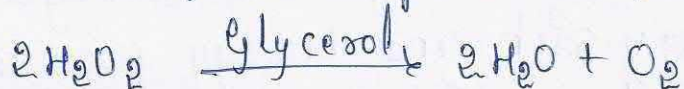

① Positive Catalyst: A catalyst, which increases the rate of reaction, is called positive catalyst and phenomenon is called positive catalysis.

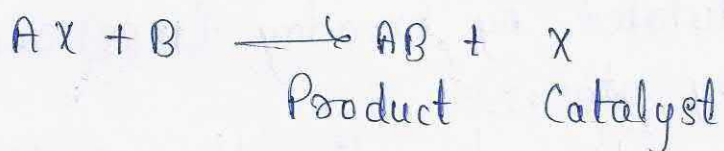

Example: Decomposition of KClO_3 in presence of MnO_2

② Negative catalyst: A catalyst which decreases the rate of reaction is known as negative catalyst or inhibitor and the phenomenon is termed as negative catalysis or inhibition.

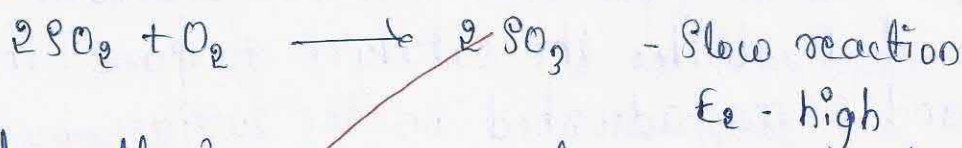

Example: Decomposition of H_2O_2 in presence of glycerol

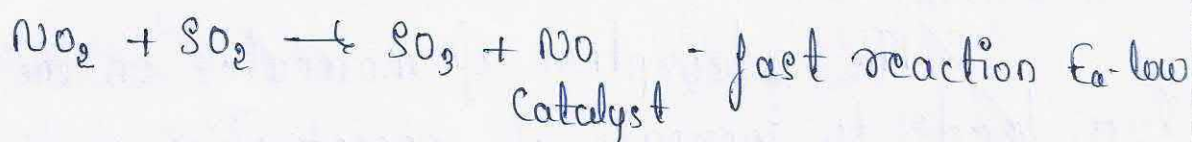

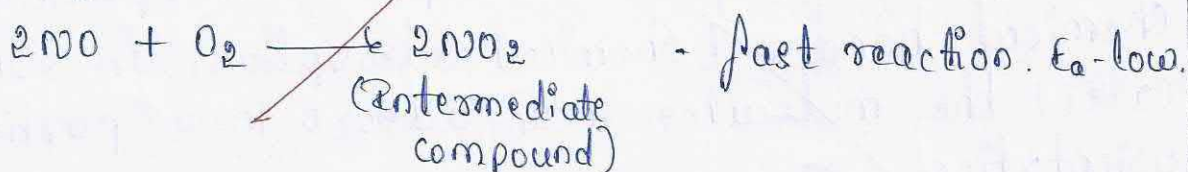

Activation energies of above reactions are low, the reaction is fast, and the formation of AB is also fast. The catalyst regenerated is again used.

Example : Preparation of SO_3 from SO_2 and O_2 :
Catalytic oxidation of sulphur dioxide in the presence of nitric oxide as catalyst Normal path.

Changed path in presence of NO catalyst

The two faster reactions replace one slow reaction. The intermediate compound is as rapidly used up as it is formed.

② Adsorption Theory : This theory is applicable to heterogeneous catalysis. It explains the mechanism of heterogeneous catalysis when the catalyst is a solid and the reactants are gases. The theory of heterogeneous catalysis or contact catalysis is based on the phenomenon of adsorption taking place

Step 3 : Formation of Activated complexes :

Due to chemical adsorption the forces that hold the atoms in the molecules of the reactants are somewhat weakened so that the adsorbed molecules are more active than the unadsorbed molecules. These adsorbed molecules can more quickly form the activated complex than the unadsorbed molecules due to lower energy of the activation.

The particles of the reactants adjacent to one another join to form an intermediate complex (A-B). The activated complex is unstable.

Step-4 : Decomposition of activated complex :

The activated complex thus formed easily decomposes out in a fast rate to form the product.

The activated complex breaks to form the products C and D. The separated particles of the products hold on^{to} the catalyst's surface by partial chemical bonds.

Step-5 : Desorption of products : The molecules of the products are desorbed & released from the surface. They are stable and can lead an independent existence.

Industrial visit report of 2021-22

As per the syllabus of Rani Channamma University, Belagavi for B.Sc. Ist & Vth Semester, we conducted industrial visit on waste water analysis and recycling (ETP) at The Krishna Co-operative Sugar factory Halyal, Athani on 5th January 2022 at 02:00 p.m. with 48 students.

As mentioned above, we visited "The Krishna co-operative sugar factory Halyal, Athani", for the study of ETP plant & waste water management. We also documented some of the photos during the industrial visit.

The B.Sc. Ist & Vth Semester students are very happy to study about the waste water management and they got the knowledge about mechanism of ETP & waste water recycling during industrial visit.

The staff members are also present during the visit, this is for your kind consideration-

DEPARTMENT OF BOTANY

INTRODUCTION

- The genus Riccia comprises about 138 species which are cosmopolitan and widely distributed both in tropical and temperate regions of the earth.
- With the exception of a single aquatic species, R. fluitans, all the other species are terrestrial.
- About 28 species of Riccia have been reported from different parts of India. Of these the common species are – R. discolor, R. crystallina, R. pathankotensis, R. melanospora, R. forstii, R. gangetica, etc.

Kingdom: Plantae

Division: Bryophyta

Class: Hepaticopsida

Order: Marchantiales

Family: Ricciaceae

Genus: Riccia

INTERNAL STRUCTURE

Internally the thallus of Riccia shows tissue differentiation of various types:

(a) Storage Region:- The lower or ventral region in cross section shows colourless, compactly arranged parenchymatous tissue without intercellular spaces.

The cells of parenchyma tissue generally lack chlorophyll and contain starch. Therefore, the ventral region primarily constitutes the storage tissue. The lower portion of storage region is bounded by a single layered epidermis, from which rhizoids of two types – smooth walled and tuberculate arises.

(b) Photosynthetic Region:- The upper or dorsal region is composed of chloroplast bearing cells arranged in vertical tiers. These tiers of cells are separated by narrow vertical air chambers. Each air chamber is generally enclosed by four rows of cells. Each air chamber communicates to the exterior by means of an air pore, which is a simple intercellular space bounded by 4-6 epidermal cells. The terminal cell of each chloroplast containing cells is colourless without pyrenoids and somewhat enlarged and forms the upper epidermis of one celled thickness.

REPRODUCTION

Vegetative Reproduction:

Vegetative reproduction takes place by the following process:

- Fragmentation:- It depends on the ageing of the vegetative cells. The cells in the older portions die of old age and eventually disorganize. When the dead and decay of the older portions of the thallus reaches the dichotomy, the young lobes become separated. Each of these by apical growth grows into a new thallus.
- Adventitious Branches:- In R. fluitans special adventitious branches arise from the ventral surface of the thallus in the midrib region. They become detached from the parent thallus by the decay of the connecting tissue and form a new plant.
- Persistent Apices:- In species growing in prolonged dry season, the whole plant die except the growing apices. The persistent apices resume growth in the succeeding rainy season.
- Tuber Formation:- It has been reported in R. perennis, R. discolor, R. vescata, and R. billardieri. The apices of the thallus lobes become thickened to form tubers at the end of the growing season. With the advent of unfavourable conditions the plant dies. The tuber remains dormant and resumes growth under suitable conditions.

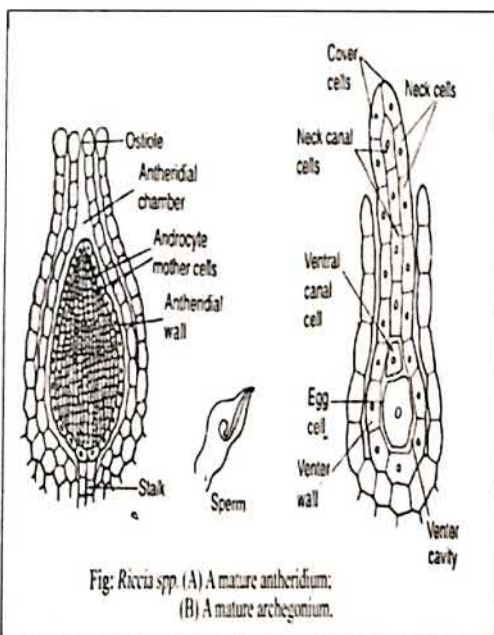

Fig: Riccia spp. (A) A mature antheridium;
(B) A mature archegonium.

Sexual Reproduction

- Riccia is mainly homothallic (monoecious) i.e., same plant body bears both male (antheridia) and female (archegonia) sex organs. Some species like R. discolor, R. frostii, etc. are heterothallic. In monoecious species both archegonia and antheridia arise singly and each lies in the floor of a separate cavity.

(a) Antheridium: Each antheridium stands in a deep pit called antheridial chamber, and is attached to the thallus tissue by means of multicellular stalk. The antheridial chamber opens at the tip by a narrow pore called ostiole.

Sexual Reproduction

- The antheridium is an ovoid or pear shaped body enclosed by a single layer of sterile jacket layer known as antheridial wall.
- Inside the jacket layer lies the numerous androcyte mother cells, metamorphose into two sperms or spermatids or androcytes.

(b) Archegonium: Each archegonium also stands in a pit called archegonial chamber. The archegonium is without stalk and is directly attached with the thallus tissue.

Sexual Reproduction

- The mature archegonium is stalked, flask-shaped and consist of venter and neck. The venter consists of a ventral canal cell and an egg cell. The neck is long and consists of a row of four neck canal cells. Each archegonium is bounded on the outer portion by a single layer of jacket cells called archegonial wall.

Fertilization

- It takes place in presence of water. The sperms or antherozoids after liberation from the antheridium swim in all directions on the film of water, and some of them reach the archegonium.
- On reaching the archegonium, the sperms make its way through the passage led by the dissolution of the neck canal cell.
- On reaching the egg, one sperm fuses with the egg to complete the fertilization. As a result of fertilization, a diploid zygote ($2n$) is formed.
- With the formation of zygote, diploid sporophytic generation begins.

SPOROPHYTIC PHASE

Immediately after the formation, the zygote enlarges in size until it nearly fills the cavity of the venter.

The zygote nucleus first divide s transversely into two cells, each of which again divide vertically to form 4-celled structure i.e., quadrant. Then another vertical division takes place so that 8-celled structure i.e., octant is formed. The cells of the octant divide and re-divide irregularly forming a spherical mass of 20 – 410 cells. Then periclinal divisions take place which cut off an outer layer of cells, called the amphithecium and inner mass of cells, called the endothecium.

The amphithecium first constitutes the jacket of capsule, but later it serves as the nutrition of the spores. The outermost layer constitutes the jacket of the mature sporophyte. The endothecium develops into sporogenous tissue. The sporogenous tissue later develops into spore mother cells. From each spore mother cell, by two successive divisions, one of which is reduction division, four haploid spores are produced. Some of the few cells of the sporogenous tissue remains sterile, and are known as nurse cells.

The mature sporophyte is a globose capsule like structure without any foot and seta. It is simply a spore case. The spore case i.e., capsule is provided with sterile jacket layer of one-celled in thickness. Inside the jacket layer, lie the spore-tetrad and nurse cells. The spores are liberated after breaking the surrounding tissue of the thallus. After liberation, the spore germinates under favourable condition by producing a germ tube to give rise to new individual Riccia plant.
